

Katie Taylor

Katie earned her bachelor's degree in speech/language pathology in 2008 and master's degree and teacher's license in deaf education in 2010 from Ball State University. She spent nine years as a teacher for students who are deaf/hard of hearing in various capacities such as preschool teacher, preschool through 12th grade itinerant for districts and cooperatives in rural, suburban and urban districts, and state-wide teacher of record.

Katie is currently serving as a state-wide specialist in areas of deaf hard of hearing and primary age transition for the PATINS Project. She is currently pursuing a doctor of education degree in special education with a concentration in special education law and policy including a license as a director of exceptional needs at Ball State University. Her research interests and publication topics include universal design for learning, assistive technology, deaf education, and students with learning differences in reading/dyslexia.